A proper name among the ancient Persians; but particularly of one of their kings, called Khusraw Parvēz, (cotemporary with Muhammad), who having been driven from his country by his uncle, took refuge with the Greek emperor Maurice, by whose assistance he defeated the usurper, and recovered his crown. Khusraw, whilst at Maurice's court, married his daughter Irene, who is highly celebrated in the East for her singular beauty, particularly by the famous Persian Nazāmī, in his poem called خسرو و شيرين (the loves of Khusraw and Shīrīn), شيرين being the name by which the Persians distinguish Irene, signifying sweet. The throne of this prince is celebrated by many Eastern historians. It is said to have been of such vast extent, that it was supported by 40,000 columns of silver; and that, among other magnificent ornaments, 1,000 globes, suspended in the dome, shewed, by various movements, the motions of the heavenly bodies: 30,000 pieces of embroidered tapestry adorned the walls; and underneath were vaults, containing immense treasures in gold, silver, and precious stones. پرويز فلک The sun.

P پري parī, Winged. A good genius, a beautiful species of imaginary creature, neither man, woman, angel, nor devil, but answering in many respects to that beneficent little being to whom our ancestors paid so much attention, called the Fairy; which, from the resemblance of the name, and many other circumstances, was in all probability of Eastern extraction. The old romances of Arabia and Persia allot them a particular country called جنستان Jinnistān, where they live upon perfume alone; and conceive them to be so extremely beautiful, that they call a lovely woman پري زادهٔ parī-zādah, born of the Parīs (the name of the second daughter of Darius, whom the Grecks have called Parisatis; corrupting in the same manner sitārah (a star) into Statira, and rōshan (splendor) into Roxana). The Dēvas, or Dēws, Jinns or Genii, are another species of ideal beings, but the reverse of the Parīs, being ugly, malignant, and perpetually at war with them and with mankind, whom the Parīs are supposed constantly to protect. These two classes of supernatural creatures form great part of the machinery of Eastern poetry, fable, and romance, and give a most fanciful and extended field to luxuriant imaginations. Parī, The sun. A جنة jannat, A garden, set with trees. A grove of palm-trees. Paradise, heaven. Muhammad knew the genius of his countrymen too well, to suppose that they would be captivated with the idea of mere spiritual enjoyments in the world to come; he therefore declared, that as the body in this life takes so much part in the sufferings of the soul, it should in justice partake of its happiness hereafter, by the most exquisite enjoyment of every corporeal sense. A vulgar notion has prevailed, that the Arabian prophet excludes women from his paradise, but he had too high regard for the sex to be guilty of so unpolite a piece of injustice: the idea originated from a verse in the Kur'ān, which most certainly allows no place there for old women; this gave so much uneasiness to an ancient dame, that she remonstrated to Muhammad upon the cruelty of the exclusion; when the prophet rendered her immediately perfectly happy, by declaring that all the old women should be restored to the bloom of youth before they entered those mansions of bliss. The Muhammadans believe that there exist eight heavens, or different degrees of felicity, for the blessed; and seven hells, or degrees of torment, for the damned; drawing from thence an inference, that the mercy of God surpasses his justice. جنت المأوي jannatu'l ma-wa', The fourth heaven formed of gold. جنت البلاد jannatu'l bilād, The paradise of regions; title of Bengal. جنت عدن jannat-i ʿadan, The garden of Eden. The more ancient traditions however place it in the island of Sarandīb or Ceylon, where they say Adam was interred; agreeable to which opinion the Portuguese have named the mountain, where they pretend to point out the grotto and sepulchre of the father of mankind, Pico d'Adam. جنت مکان jannat-makān (or P جنت آشیاني jannat-āshiyānī), Placed in paradise (a mode of speaking of deceased princes). اهالي جنت ahālī-i jannat, The inhabitants of paradise. بطنان الجنت butnānu'l jannat, The middle of paradise.
